T the threshold of the Dwor (the Polish name of the great house in a country parish) were gathered, on a bright August evening in 1862, a group of peasant girls, bringing, according to Polish custom, a garland of corn and flowers to the owner of the lands on which the harvest has been concluded. To present this garland is considered a post of honor; and the peasant girls who had chosen Magda as their representative were surprised that the distinction did not seem able to remove the sadness and depression which seemed to overshadow...
