In poetic form, it would lead to the use together of sounds allied rather than alike. For instance, b and may be said to be allied, in the sense, too, of being consonant. They differ in that b has a preliminary sound, and p has none. But they are so nearly alike that the mind often confounds them, as is proved in the history of derivations; and so too does the ear, as is proved by the endeavor of a foreigner to imitate the pronunciation of a native word containing one of them. For the same reasons v and f also are allied and consonant; and so, though less clearly, are all four of these consonants--b, p, v, and f. The same thing may be affirmed of d and t, of th (hard), and th (soft), and of all four; also of k (c hard or q) and g hard; of j (g soft) and ch soft; of m and n, of r and l, of z and s, of zh and si, of the consonants y and i, also of y and long u. A succession of sounds thus allied is termed by Professor Sylvester, in his Laws of Verse, phonetic syzygy. To confirm what has been said, notice that, in the following, b, v, and f have almost the same effects as alliteration, but without any suggestion of artificial mechanism such as might result were these letters identical: Not to us is...
