Not illustrated. 1912 Excerpt: .etc., we should seldom have a case of the so-called acid intoxication in typhoid fever. Cases of this fulminating type of acetonuria are nearly always due to neglect, to starvation, or to too large a proportion of proteid diet (beef teas, beef extracts, predigested beef, etc.). It should, therefore, be emphasized that the diet in typhoid fever should contain a fair proportion of the carbohydrates in order to avoid a toxic degree of acetonuria. In Pregnancy. The toxaemias of pregnancy have been for the last decade a subject of very peculiar interest, and especially so since modern investigations have practically settled the question of the nature of puerperal eclampsia. The pathology of this alarming disorder has been studied, reviewed and discussed by thousands who were eager to discover and establish a correct view of its real cause. The delicate structures of the body, including the brain, heart, bloodvessels, glandular organs, etc., have been examined upon autopsies with the most discriminating care. The almost constant pathological lesions in the uriniferous tubules of the kidneys, the degenerative changes in the hepatic lobules, advancing at times even to a central necrosis, the capillary hemorrhages throughout areas of the liver substance, as well as the tendency toward similar hemorrhages in other portions of the body, presented problems of the most perplexing character. The result of all these investigations for years only left the profession in a chaos of opinions. And it has only been since we have seen puerperal eclampsia...
