Whose deep-toned music would mens dreams excite And plaudits--which, as seas, should swing In ever-widening billows, and should ring Like living laughter that would change the night And silence into joy and grace and light, And make its glooms and solitudes to sing. I wrote, and no one read my poem through. And then I found a feather from a mourning dove, Dropped from its wing in flying through a wood. And wrote a psalm of pain and pity, true To life, and tender with immortal love: And weary hearts both read and understood. -- Quayle. Is Nature Cruel Joseph Conrad, a writer of the sea, describes, in graphic fashion, a rescue of the survivors of a water-logged derelict which had been drifting in mid-ocean for weeks. The merciless struggle which the survivors had made was at last too...
