Not illustrated. 1908 Excerpt: .down in a precise form of observations and experiments in the physical sciences, in chemistry, astronomy and physiology. In the prefatory remarks to the third volume, they observed that in the field of the arts (using that word in the wide sense of practical applications of the various sciences to the advancement and satisfaction of human needs and desires) the Encyclopedia will commence what future generations will finish and perfect. The arts, the precious monuments of human industry, will no longer run the risk of being lost and forgotten; facts will not be buried in the workshops or retained only in the hands of artist; they will be laid open before philosophers, and enlightened reflection will do what the blind practice of the empiric could not achieve. The collaborateurs of the great eighteenth century dictionary had all the primitive simplicity of the early Renaissance workers in...
